Case Stories Offer Practical Training

NCEDL has developed a series of case stories that can be used for early childhood teacher preparation and staff development. The stories are an outgrowth of the Case Method of Instruction Outreach Project co-directed by P.J. McWilliam of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and Pat Snyder of Louisiana State University

Detailed narratives useful in training practitioners for real life

A SERIES OF CASE STORIES, based on real life situations, has been posted on the web site of the National Center for Early Development & Learning. The case stories are narrative descriptions of situations likely to be encountered by practitioners. The stories present a dilemma from the point of view of a practitioner or group of practitioners. The situations are complex, with multiple factors contributing to the problem(s). There is no one obvious solution but, rather, several alternative solutions.

Each case story includes discussion questions.

A biting incident at a child care center

As an example of a case story, here are excerpts from one entitled "Pink Slip:"

"I don't get paid enough to have to put up with this kind of stuff," Stacy said to Tamara while helping two-year-old Samantha with her puzzle. "I was on the phone half the night trying to smooth things over," she continued, pointing to the hole where the apple-shaped puzzle piece was supposed to go.

The little girl put the wooden apple shape on top of the hole and twisted it around until it slipped into place. "Good girl!" praised Stacy, "Now put it away. It's almost time for juice and crackers." She gave Samantha's bottom a gentle pat as she toddled off towards the toy shelf with the puzzle.

"I thought you talked to her yesterday afternoon when she picked Michael up," said Tamara, pouring the children's juice into paper cups and sitting them one at a time on the small table where the 16 toddlers were congregating.

"Well, apparently that wasn't enough," said Stacy, removing little Carly's hands from the basket of oversized Lego blocks on a nearby shelf and directing her to a chair at the snack table. "She had to call me at home and start it all over again," she continued, tousling Carly's dark curls, handing her a graham cracker, and pushing her juice cup within reach. "She was hysterical about it. You'd have thought Michael had been mauled by a pit bull. I can understand her being a little upset about her kid being bitten but, good grief, it didn't even break the skin!"

Tamara rolled her eyes in agreement. "What did she say?"

"Evidently she took him straight to the doctor's office after she left here, cause she said the doctor told her

Case stories on web site

- Pink Slip: Child care staff face angry parents over one child's biting.
- Big Business: A child care staff member informs an inspector that the children have not been receiving their milk.
- Jack and Jill—and Sam?: A child care center struggles to learn how to include a child with special needs.
- Family Profiles: Four profiles of families for whom child care/higher quality child care is needed.

about how dangerous human bites were—that they can cause serious infections and that sometimes kids can have to be put in the hospital to get intravenous antibiotics. Well, at that point she starts sobbing into the phone....I mean, really!”

“You’re kidding?” said Tamara, handing out the last cup of juice. “She was actually crying about it?”

“I kid you not,” said Stacy. “Then she goes and gets all huffy about it and—while she’s still crying, mind you—she tells me that if anything like that should happen to her poor, sweet, little Michael, she’s going to sue Carly’s parents for medical expenses.”

“I thought she and Carly’s mom were friends,” said Tamara. “Don’t they both belong to some highfalutin’ country club or something?”

“Yeah. I thought they were friends, too. It makes you wonder if she’s said anything to Carly’s mom. My bet is she’s being two-faced about it.”

“It wouldn’t surprise me. What did she expect you to do about it?”

Discussion questions

Each case story is followed by a number of discussion questions. Here are several that accompany the case story involving Carly:

- Are Michael’s and Andrew’s mothers’ reactions to Carly’s biting justified? Are their reactions unusual or would other parents be likely to respond in a similar manner?
- In the story, Stacy asks herself why it is that parents react more emotionally to children’s biting than to other forms of aggression. Is this true? If so, how would you answer her question?
- The other parents are obviously holding Stacy at least partially responsible for their children being bitten. To what extent, if any, should Stacy feel responsible?

Family profiles

Among the case stories on our web site are four family profiles useful for analyzing service systems and policies that affect the quality of care for young children. Here are summaries of two of the family profiles:

The Green Family: Dorothy Green thought she was finished with raising babies, but now Brianna, her youngest, has lost custody of Jonathan (age 3) and Kisha (10 months) due to neglect. While Brianna is in drug rehabilitation Dorothy is taking care of Jonathan and Kisha, but it’s exhausting work. Especially now that Dorothy’s other daughter Lynette drops her two children off at Dorothy’s three days a week.

The Carter Family: Elaine and Larry Carter hardly see each other anymore. Elaine stays home during the day with William (3) and Elliott (2) while Alicia (6) is at school. Then Elaine does the 4 PM to 12 AM shift at the kitchen appliance factory while Larry takes care of the kids at night. For the first time in years the Carters are finally able to start saving money to buy a home of their own since Elaine’s salary no longer goes to pay for child care. But are the monetary savings worth what they’re going through?
